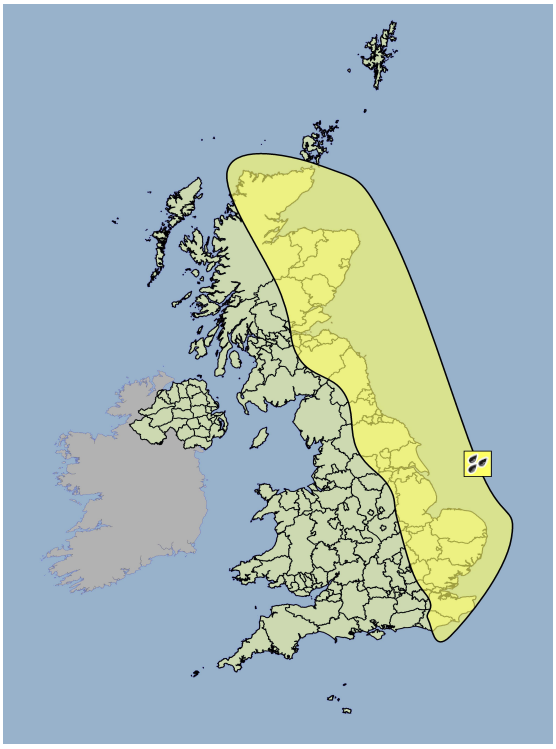
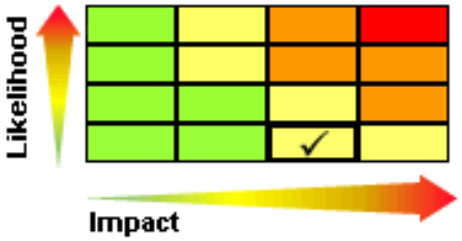
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
The remnants of the very warm, humid airmass are still likely to be affecting eastern parts of the UK into Sunday. As a result, further thundery showers are likely to affect these parts, both on Saturday night and re-forming in places on Sunday in response to daytime heating. Again there remains significant uncertainty regarding exactly where these may develop and, as often happens in this situation, some areas will stay dry. As a result, further updates to this warning are to be expected.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Sun, 20th Jul 2014 until 23:55 on Sun, 20th Jul 2014

Scattered thundery showers may continue on Saturday night in eastern areas of the UK. During Sunday further heavy, thundery showers are likely to develop in some eastern parts of the UK. Many places within the warning area could stay dry. However where storms do occur, torrential downpours are possible with lightning, hail and perhaps locally strong wind gusts. The public should be aware of the risk of surface water flooding or localised flooding from fast-responding urban watercourses.

This is an update to the warning to include parts of southeast England.
